

Profile: Dr. Ben (Benjamin) Robinson, MD

- SGU Admissions Interviewer

Background and Education

Dr. Philip “Ben” Robinson, MD is an alumnus of St. George’s University (SGU) School of Medicine and a long-time contributor to its admissions process. He earned his Bachelor of Science from Pepperdine University in 1994 and went on to complete a Master of Science in Health and Exercise Science at Wake Forest University in 1997 . He subsequently attended SGU for medical school (class of 1997) . Dr. Robinson is board-certified in Emergency Medicine, having completed his emergency medicine residency at Detroit Receiving Hospital (Wayne State University) in Detroit, Michigan . This strong academic and clinical training laid the foundation for his dual career in medicine and medical education.

Medical Specialty and Training

With a specialty in Emergency Medicine, Dr. Robinson’s clinical training was rigorous. After earning his MD at SGU, he pursued residency at the high-volume Detroit Receiving Hospital, affiliated with Wayne State, which is known for training in trauma and emergency care . By completing this residency, he gained board certification in emergency medicine and practical experience in a fast-paced clinical environment. There is no indication that he pursued additional fellowships beyond his emergency medicine residency – instead, his career trajectory transitioned toward medical education and admissions. His background in health and exercise science (M.S.) also suggests a solid grounding in physiology and preventive medicine, complementing his emergency medicine focus. This combination of broad scientific education and front-line clinical experience equipped Dr. Robinson with insights into both the academic preparation and personal qualities needed for success in medical school.

Professional Roles and Affiliations

In clinical practice, Dr. Robinson worked as an emergency physician (details of his practice years are not widely publicized), but he became especially distinguished in the realm of medical school admissions and advising. An SGU graduate himself, he remained engaged with his alma mater through the Alumni Admission Mentor Program (AAMP) for many years . As a volunteer in AAMP, he hosted information sessions for prospective students and served as an interviewer evaluating applicants to SGU's School of Medicine . In 2015, SGU formally brought him on staff: Dr. Ben Robinson was appointed Assistant Director of Admission for Canada . In this role, he focused on recruiting and advising Canadian applicants, leveraging his experience to grow SGU's outreach in Canada. For example, he traveled extensively – hosting university info sessions across the United States and Canada and representing SGU at graduate fairs . In 2016, he was even the SGU official to sign a memorandum of understanding with Brandon University (Canada) to create a pathway for Brandon's science graduates to gain entry into SGU's medical and veterinary programs . (In a news photo from that event, Dr. Robinson appears alongside Brandon University's president as they formalized the agreement, underscoring his senior role in admissions .)

By the late 2010s, Dr. Robinson also became involved in medical education consulting outside of SGU. He served as a strategic advisor with MedSchoolCoach, a U.S.-based admissions consulting firm, sharing his expertise in med school interview strategy . In this capacity, he has appeared on podcasts and given talks to help aspiring medical students navigate interviews. His dual identity – as a practicing physician and an admissions insider – has made him a valuable resource for guiding future medical professionals.

Involvement with SGU Admissions

Dr. Robinson's involvement with SGU's admissions process is extensive. As an SGU alumnus (MD '97) deeply appreciative of the opportunity SGU provides, he has been an advocate for the university and its applicants . Over the years he has:

- Conducted countless interviews with prospective SGU medical students as part of the admissions evaluation. He has been noted as one of the regular interviewers for SGU, particularly for applicants from the Midwest U.S. and Canada. For instance, applicants have reported interviewing with him in cities like Chicago, Illinois and via online/phone for Canadian admissions.
- Hosted information sessions and webinars: In his admissions roles, Dr. Robinson often led info sessions to introduce SGU to pre-med audiences. He would present on the curriculum, clinical rotations, residency outcomes, and campus life, addressing concerns about going overseas for medical school. His ease in speaking to groups is frequently mentioned; one Instagram announcement from a university pre-med club introduced him as “our first representative from St. George’s University, Mr. Benjamin Robinson” for a virtual Q&A session , highlighting his approachability.

- Mentored prospective students: Through AAMP, he made himself available as a mentor and point of contact for students considering SGU. The SGU admissions newsletter noted that after joining the staff, “he looks forward to meeting with prospective students in Quebec” during a Canadian recruitment tour , reflecting his mentorship spirit.
- Developed admissions strategy: Given his title (Assistant Director for Canada) and later consulting work, Dr. Robinson likely had input on admissions policies, such as forging partnerships (e.g., the Brandon University MOU) and shaping interview content to identify candidates who will thrive at SGU. In media remarks, he has demonstrated transparency about SGU’s challenges and advantages – for example, discussing the high tuition cost but also scholarship opportunities in a Canadian news article . This suggests he values honesty and ensuring students make fully informed decisions.

Even after transitioning from his official SGU staff role (he appears to have left the Assistant Director position around 2017), Dr. Robinson continues to conduct student interviews for SGU on a volunteer basis. Admissions staff changes notwithstanding, his enduring presence as an interviewer shows his dedication to the institution. He remains one of the experienced faces of SGU admissions that applicants may encounter.

Interview Style and Approach

Those who have interacted with Dr. Ben Robinson during their SGU interviews describe the experience as professional yet conversational. SGU interviews in general are known to be more laid-back than some U.S. medical school interviews, and Dr. Robinson’s style reflects that ethos – with a few personal nuances.

- Relaxed, student-friendly atmosphere: Many candidates note that their interview with Dr. Robinson felt “very relaxed” . In one case, he even met the applicant at a café for a breakfast meeting, conducting the interview over coffee in an informal setting . He often strives to put applicants at ease, opening the conversation in a friendly manner. Dr. Robinson has said that half the goal of an interview is simply “to have a good conversation; one that is fun, lively, and filled with curiosity”. True to that philosophy, he tends to engage applicants in a dialogue rather than a strict Q&A interrogation. Candidates are encouraged to ask him questions as well – indeed, SGU interviews are meant to be two-way, ensuring the student has fully considered SGU and can get their concerns addressed .

- Informative and candid: Dr. Robinson is known to be “very informative” about SGU . Because he is an alumnus and former admissions officer, he is extremely knowledgeable about the program. Applicants often find that he will openly discuss details of SGU’s curriculum, clinical rotation sites, residency match rates, life in Grenada, etc. If you express genuine interest, he responds with substantial information. One student from 2006 remarked that Dr. Robinson “gave me great insight into the school” during their talk . This means that beyond evaluating you, he might also be selling SGU to you, highlighting what the school can offer. He likely appreciates when students have specific questions, as it lets him share more about SGU.
- Professionalism and seriousness: Despite the overall relaxed vibe, Dr. Robinson maintains a professional demeanor. Some candidates interpret this as sternness. For example, a 2011 interviewee felt that “he was in a hurry” and “not a single smile outta this guy”, describing the session as rapid-fire questions with little small talk . It’s possible that when he has back-to-back interviews or limited time, he becomes very direct and time-efficient. He might jump straight into important questions and expect concise answers. In such cases, applicants have found him polite but somewhat reserved. Another student who interacted via email noted he came across as “a pretty strict person” . This suggests that Dr. Robinson can be all-business if needed, focusing on the task at hand (especially if the interview schedule is tight or if he wants to cover many topics quickly). Don’t be discouraged if he isn’t overtly warm; this does not necessarily mean the interview is going poorly – it may be just his focused style in that moment.
- Question content and focus: The content of a Dr. Robinson interview typically covers standard med school interview topics – expect to discuss your academic background, motivations for becoming a doctor, experiences in healthcare or service, and why you are interested in SGU. A particular emphasis, as noted by past applicants, is “Why SGU?” and whether you have thought through attending a Caribbean medical school . He wants to see that you haven't chosen SGU on a whim. Often he will ask something like, "If you don't get into any medical school this cycle, what will you do?", probing how committed you are and whether you view SGU as a viable path, not just a last resort. He may also inquire about your specialty interests – one SGU grad recounted that interviewers gauge if you have "aspirations of like ortho or derm or some competitive field", since aiming for an ultra-competitive specialty might indicate misaligned expectations. This doesn't mean you cannot have big ambitions, but you should articulate a realistic plan (for example, expressing openness to various fields or a passion for a less oversubscribed specialty can reassure him).

In line with his own interview philosophy, Dr. Robinson cares about the qualities and reasoning behind your answers, not just the facts. He has publicly stated that an interview isn't about getting "the right answer" to some prompt, but about showing qualities of mind like "curiosity, empathy, critical thinking, judgment, ... emotional stability". Therefore, he might pose a question about an ethical scenario or a challenging situation from your past to see how you think and what personal attributes you reveal. Common questions could include: "Tell me about a time you overcame a hardship," "How do you handle stress or failure?" or "What do you know about Grenada/SGU's system?" – each inviting you to demonstrate your preparedness and character.

- Interview format: Historically, SGU interviews conducted by alumni like Dr. Robinson were one-on-one and semi-structured. They often lasted around 30 minutes to an hour. In one account, the interview was "only 20 mins of questions" followed by "10 mins of writing". Indeed, SGU for many years included a short written essay component at the end of the interview. Dr. Robinson has followed this format: after the oral interview, he might give you a prompt and ask you to handwrite (or if virtual, type) a short response on the spot within a time limit (~10 minutes). The writing prompt is usually a simple question like "Why do you want to be a doctor?" or "Describe a significant challenge and how you dealt with it." This is meant to assess your communication skills and ensure the personal statement you submitted was your own work. Be prepared for this impromptu writing exercise just in case – it's a part of "what to expect" that prior candidates have mentioned. (If the interview is online, he may still ask you to email a quick written response or type it in a monitored environment.)

- Consistency and variability: It's worth noting that applicant impressions of Dr. Robinson have varied, which is normal over such a long span of him conducting interviews (he's been interviewing since at least the mid-2000s). Some sessions have been more conversational and encouraging, and others more rapid and businesslike. One early interviewee (2006) who met him in person left with a very positive impression, emphasizing that it was "really good... very relaxed". On the other hand, a later applicant (2011) felt "terrible after the interview" due to its brisk tone. These differences could depend on context such as time constraints, the applicant's responsiveness, or even Dr. Robinson's workload that day. Importantly, the core purpose remains the same: he wants to assess if you are a good fit for SGU and if SGU is a good fit for you. He is not trying to trip you up with trick questions or stress you out deliberately. In fact, as an interviewer he often genuinely wants the candidate to succeed and feel comfortable – a reflection of SGU's supportive approach. So even if his demeanor is serious, remember that he's listening closely to your answers and giving you a chance to shine.

Applicant Experiences and Testimonials

Feedback from past SGU interviewees who met with Dr. Robinson provides valuable insight into what it's like to interview with him:

- "Relaxed and conversational" – "Just got back...it was actually really good. I interviewed with Dr. Robinson. He's very informative and really gave me great insight into the school. The interview session was very relaxed and we had it while drinking coffee and eating." (Interviewed in downtown Chicago). This testimonial highlights his approachable side and willingness to make the interview informal. The applicant felt at ease and learned a lot about SGU in the process.
- Efficient and to-the-point – "I just had my interview with Dr. Robinson a few hours ago... The interview was only 20 mins of questions and 10 mins of writing. He seemed like he was in a hurry to get outta there. He just kept throwing questions at me... I tried to ease the air by laughing a bit but not a single smile outta this guy." (Interview from 2011). This person's experience was that the interview moved quickly and that Dr. Robinson maintained a poker face. Although it left the candidate unsure about how they fared, this reflects Dr. Robinson's tendency to cover the necessary ground efficiently. It's a reminder that even if the interviewer isn't overtly reassuring, many such candidates still end up admitted – the formality isn't a sign of rejection.

- Nervous expectations – “OMG he is going to interview me tmr... I had a few conversations with him via email previously and had already thought that he was a pretty strict person. Now it comes true lol” (From a 2016 applicant the night before their interview). This comment (admittedly a nervous pre-interview post) shows that Dr. Robinson’s reputation as a “strict” interviewer is known among some applicants. However, it’s often anxiety speaking – many who fear a tough interview find it’s more congenial than expected.
- General SGU admissions feedback – “All the SGU interviews are very relaxed though from my experience and from everyone I talked to. It’s mostly a time for you to ask questions. They want to make sure you have fully thought out your decision to attend SGU and also that you don’t have aspirations of like ortho or derm or some competitive field.” (Advice from an SGU student). This aligns with how Dr. Robinson conducts his interviews: he will certainly check that you understand what attending SGU entails and gauge whether your goals are realistic given the opportunities SGU provides. He isn’t there to drill you on science trivia; he’s evaluating fit and commitment.

In summary, past applicants describe Dr. Robinson as knowledgeable and straightforward. If you demonstrate genuine interest in SGU, he often reciprocates with encouragement and detailed answers. If you come off as unprepared or disinterested, you might experience a shorter, less warm interview. The key takeaway from these testimonials is that an interview with Dr. Ben Robinson can range from casual chat to rapid Q&A, but in all cases, staying composed and engaged is critical. Many students who interviewed with him have successfully gained admission to SGU, proving that even an interview that felt tough can still result in a positive outcome. His style may keep you on your toes, but it also gives you ample opportunity to make your case.

Publications and Media Appearances

Dr. Robinson’s expertise in medical school admissions has led to a few media and speaking appearances, particularly in venues related to medical education:

- Podcast Interview on ProspectiveDoctor (2018) – Dr. Robinson was featured in episode 26 of the ProspectiveDoctor Podcast, titled “Interview Strategy.” In this discussion, introduced as “a strategic advisor of Med School Coach,” he shares insights on how applicants should approach med school interviews. He talks about shifting the mindset from trying to recite ideal answers to actually understanding the purpose of the interview. Notably, he emphasizes that an interview should be “a lively conversation” and that the interviewee should aim to demonstrate qualities like empathy, curiosity, and stability of character . He even mentions techniques like preparing an “elevator pitch” – a concise personal introduction that respects the interviewer’s time and invites deeper questions . This public advice mirrors the qualities he likely looks for when he is the interviewer. The podcast appearance highlights Dr. Robinson’s thought leadership in admissions; he is effectively coaching applicants on how to impress interviewers like himself by being genuine and strategic. (For anyone interviewing with him, it’s almost like getting tips directly from the source on how to succeed!)

- Media quotes as SGU Admissions Director – During his tenure with SGU, Dr. Robinson appeared in news articles as an official representative of the university. For example, The Brandon Sun (a Canadian newspaper) quoted Dr. Robinson in a 2016 piece about the SGU-Brandon University partnership. He provided details on SGU’s tuition and scholarship options, acting as an authority on admissions matters . Such appearances show that he was trusted to speak on behalf of SGU, and he used media opportunities to inform and recruit prospective students. While these aren’t “publications” in the academic sense, they are part of his contribution to public discourse on international medical education.
- Webinars and University Presentations – Although specific recordings are not readily available, it’s known that Dr. Robinson has led numerous online webinars (especially targeting Canadian pre-meds) and given talks at universities. For instance, pre-med student clubs (like one at University of Toronto Scarborough) have hosted him for virtual info sessions, billed as an expert who can answer questions about SGU and the admissions process . In these forums, he often shares both his personal journey (as a non-traditional student who went to SGU after doing a master’s, etc.) and advice for applicants. His willingness to engage with students in various media demonstrates a passion for mentorship and education.
- No major research publications – Given that Dr. Robinson’s career veered into admissions and advising, he does not appear to have a raft of research publications or academic journal articles to his name (at least none that are widely cited). His contributions are more practical and advisory in nature, rather than research-based. This is not unusual for physicians in administrative or mentoring roles.

In summary, Dr. Robinson’s “public presence” is mostly as an admissions expert and SGU ambassador. He leverages platforms like podcasts, news media, and webinars to demystify the med school interview process and to promote the opportunities at SGU. For an SGU hopeful, listening to his podcast advice or reading his quotes can provide a window into what he values, which is immensely useful when preparing to meet him.

Strategic Checklist: How to Impress Dr. Ben Robinson in Your SGU Interview

Based on Dr. Robinson’s background, style, and the experiences of past interviewees, here is a checklist of actionable steps to help you shine during your upcoming interview with him:

- Do Your SGU Homework: Show that you know SGU. Be ready to articulate why SGU is the right choice for you – e.g. its curriculum structure, global opportunities, USMLE track record, etc. Dr. Robinson will expect that you have “fully thought out your decision to attend SGU”. Mention specific features you like about SGU (such as the international clinical rotations or strong residency match in primary care) to demonstrate genuine interest.
- Convey Commitment (with Realism): Present yourself as a serious, committed future medical student. If asked about other applications or your career goals, answer honestly but tactfully. Avoid heavily emphasizing ultra-competitive specialties (like dermatology or orthopedics) as your sole ambition – unless you explain it in context – because he might worry you’re not the right fit. It’s fine to have interests, but also express openness to various fields or a primary care focus. The key is to show you’re passionate about becoming a doctor first, and that you’re flexible about how you’ll serve. This will assure him you’re not viewing SGU merely as a “backup plan.”
- Be Ready for “Why Medicine”: Like any med school interviewer, Dr. Robinson will likely ask you to discuss your motivations for pursuing medicine. Have a compelling personal narrative ready – perhaps an anecdote about a formative experience in healthcare or a mentor who inspired you. Make it sincere and reflective of who you are. Given his interest in your qualities, emphasize what you learned from the experience (e.g. “It taught me empathy and perseverance, which I will carry into my medical training"). Avoid clichés and focus on your unique journey to this point.

- Prepare an Elevator Pitch: Craft a brief (1–2 minute) summary of yourself: your background, key accomplishments, and why you want to be a physician. Dr. Robinson himself advocates using an “elevator pitch” to start strong. This could come in handy if he says, “Tell me about yourself” or if you find an opening to introduce yourself succinctly. Practice this pitch so that it’s clear and concise – it should highlight the big points of your story in a coherent way. This respects his time and showcases your communication skills.
- Demonstrate the Qualities He Seeks: Throughout the interview, consciously display the attributes Dr. Robinson values in a future physician. From his own words, qualities like curiosity, empathy, critical thinking, good judgment, resilience, and kindness stand out. How do you show this? For curiosity, ask thoughtful follow-up questions or remark on something you found intriguing about SGU or medicine. For empathy, you might describe volunteer work or a patient interaction that changed your perspective. For critical thinking/judgment, perhaps discuss how you solved a problem or made an important decision in a past job or research project. You don’t need to enumerate these traits explicitly; instead, let them come through naturally in your stories and responses.
- Practice Common Questions: While Dr. Robinson can make the interview feel like a conversation, he will still likely cover common questions. Rehearse answers for questions like:
 - “Why did you choose to apply to SGU?” (Tip: mention its strengths and how those align with your goals).
 - “What are your strengths and weaknesses?” (Tip: tie a strength to those key qualities, and for a weakness, mention one with a note on how you’re working to improve it).
 - “Tell me about a challenge or failure and how you handled it.” (Tip: use the STAR method – Situation, Task, Action, Result – to structure a story that shows resilience or growth).
 - “How do you plan to handle the rigors of medical school (possibly far from home)?” (Tip: highlight your adaptability, support system, and stress-management strategies).

Practice speaking these answers aloud so you can deliver them smoothly but not robotically. Dr. Robinson will appreciate polished, well-thought-out answers as long as they still feel genuine.

- Show Enthusiasm and Engagement: Bring a positive energy to the conversation. Smile (appropriately), make eye contact (or camera contact, if virtual), and listen actively. If he shares information or a personal anecdote, acknowledge it and respond – e.g., “That’s interesting – I hadn’t known that about the SGU clinical sites.” Creating a “fun, lively” dialogue is one of his goals, so don’t shy away from a bit of back-and-forth. Just remain respectful and don’t dominate the conversation. Enthusiasm can be infectious; if he sees you’re genuinely excited about the opportunity, it helps leave a positive impression.
- Have 2–3 Insightful Questions Ready: Dr. Robinson almost always gives candidates a chance to ask questions. In fact, SGU interviews are structured to allow “time for you to ask questions”. Prepare a few thoughtful questions that cannot be answered by a simple website lookup. For example, you might ask: “What do you think sets successful SGU students apart, and how can I prepare to be one of them?”, or “How did you find the transition from SGU to residency, and what advice would you give incoming students to make the most of the experience?” Because he’s an alumnus, asking about his personal experience (in a respectful way) can get him to share insights. You could also inquire about the recent enhancements in the curriculum or support services for students (showing you’re keeping up with SGU news). Avoid questions that are too basic (e.g. “What’s the class size?” if that info is readily available) or overly aggressive (like overly specific match statistics – those can be looked up). Engage him with questions that show you’re already picturing yourself at SGU and seeking wisdom to thrive there.
- Remain Calm and Flexible: If the interview takes a turn to a difficult question or if Dr. Robinson’s pace speeds up, stay composed. He may throw a challenging scenario or unexpected question at you – partly to see how you think on your feet. Take a moment to gather your thoughts if needed (it’s perfectly fine to say, “Let me take a second to think about that,” rather than blurting out something incoherent). If he cuts in with another question, don’t be rattled; it might be his style to keep it moving. Maintain a polite and unflappable demeanor. If you don’t know an answer, it’s better to admit, “I’m not sure about that, but here's how I might approach finding the answer..." rather than guessing or making something up. This shows honesty and teachability.

- Be Prepared for a Written Exercise: Given past interview formats, be ready for the possibility of a short on-the-spot writing prompt. To prepare, practice writing a quick paragraph or two in a timed setting about common themes (why medicine, ethical dilemma, etc.). Focus on organizing your thoughts with a clear introduction and conclusion even in a brief response. During the interview, if Dr. Robinson says there will be a written component, don't panic – this is your chance to further impress him with your ability to communicate in writing. Write neatly (or type effectively if it's digital), and make sure to answer the question directly. Given his attention to clear communication, a well-written few paragraphs free of spelling/grammar issues will reflect well on you.
- Professionalism Matters: Treat this like a formal interview in terms of etiquette. Punctuality is crucial – log into the Zoom or arrive at the location at least 5-10 minutes early. Dress professionally (business attire) even if the interview is virtual; it will put you in the right mindset and show you respect the occasion. Address him as "Dr. Robinson" unless he invites you to use his first name. During the introduction, offer a firm handshake if in person (or a confident greeting on camera). Small talk is fine, but let him lead it. Also, have a copy of your application/resume handy; he may refer to something from your file, and you'll want to quickly orient yourself. By presenting yourself professionally, you signal that you take this opportunity seriously – something he will definitely notice.
- Adapt to the Medium: If your interview is virtual (which is common for SGU), practice the setup. Test your internet connection, camera, and microphone beforehand. Choose a quiet, well-lit environment. The goal is to ensure there are no technical distractions that could cut into your conversation. Dr. Robinson has done many in-person interviews, but as an admissions veteran he's also adapted to online interviews. You want the tech to be seamless so that your interaction feels as close to face-to-face as possible. Look at the camera when speaking (to simulate eye contact) and keep your posture attentive.
- Mind Your Communication Style: Answer questions clearly and concisely. Given his preference for coherent narratives, avoid rambling. It's okay to take a second to structure your answer in your head. Aim to answer the question asked, then provide a bit of elaboration or example to support it. If he wants more detail, he'll ask. Also, be mindful of your tone – speak confidently but not arrogantly, and be honest and thoughtful in your responses. If you need to clarify a question (for example, if you're unsure what he's asking), it's fine to ask for clarification. That is much better than going off on a tangent unrelated to what he's after.

- Show Appreciation for His Time and Perspective: Given that Dr. Robinson has a wealth of experience, you might acknowledge that near the end. For instance, when you get a chance to ask questions, a question like "What do you enjoy about being part of the SGU admissions process?" could not only yield useful info but also flatter him subtly by recognizing his long involvement. As you conclude, thank him sincerely for the discussion. Even if he maintained a formal tone, a genuine "Thank you for taking the time to speak with me, Dr. Robinson. I enjoyed our conversation and I'm even more excited about SGU now" can leave a positive final impression. This reinforces your interest and ends the interview on a gracious note.
- Post-Interview Follow-Up: After the interview, it's good practice to send a brief thank-you email within 24 hours. Keep it short and professional: thank him for the opportunity to interview, mention something specific you enjoyed or found valuable in the conversation (e.g. "I appreciated the insights you shared about the clinical rotations"), and reassert your enthusiasm for attending SGU. Not all interviewers expect or require a thank-you note, but it's a courteous gesture that can set you apart (and Dr. Robinson being old-school in some ways may indeed appreciate it). Make sure the email is well-written and polite. This is your final touchpoint to remind him of your professionalism and interest.

Following this checklist will help you approach your interview with Dr. Ben Robinson with confidence and a strategic mindset. By being knowledgeable about SGU, earnest and reflective about your goals, and engaging in a respectful dialogue, you'll increase your chances of leaving a strong impression. Remember, Dr. Robinson wants to find great future doctors for SGU – your task is to convince him that you are one of them. Good luck!
